£10 Million Youth Aspiration Funding Announced

The fourth funding round of the Youth Sector Development Fund (YSDF) is now open for applications.

School Minister Ian Wright has welcomed applications from third sector organisations to bid for a share of the £10 million fund aimed at raising the aspirations of disadvantaged young people.

This is the fourth round of the Government's YSDF scheme, which will focus on the aims of the recently published Information, Advice and Guidance strategy.

Bids are welcomed which aim to show young people the full range of options open to them in education and work, providing real work experience across a variety of careers. It is expected that around 25 third sector organisations will receive a mix of grants and business support from the fund from April 2010 to March 2011.

Mr Wright said: "Many organisations in the third sector are already working with disadvantaged young people and parents in innovative ways that challenge negative stereotypes and raise aspirations.

"Today I am inviting these organisations to build on that experience and to develop exciting new approaches so that young people and parents get the impartial information, advice and guidance about learning and work opportunities that they need, including experiencing those routes at first hand.

"In particular I want to see proposals which will help young people and their families with low aspirations and capture their imagination through exciting forms of work experience, 'tasters' and work-related learning, and increase support through mentoring."

Deadline for applications: 04.02.10

To apply please visit the YSDF www.ysdf.ecotec.com/

Children in Need launches new grants programme

By Andy Ricketts, Third Sector Online, 23 December 2009

Children in Need is offering small grants of up to £10,000 a year for three years for third sector organisations working with children and young people.

It is the first time the organisation has run a UK-wide small grants programme, and follows a pilot in Scotland. The scheme is designed to reach organisations that have not previously considered applying for Children in Need funding.

Grants will be allocated in four tranches, with application deadlines on 15

January, 15 April, 15 July and 15 October.

Any not-for-profit organisation working with children and young people under the age of 18 can apply, with some exclusions such as projects carrying out medical research or promoting religion. Decisions are expected to be made within 14 weeks of the closing date of each round.

Sheila Jane Malley, director of grants and policy at Children in Need, said the organisation was looking for charities with well thought-through aims.

"The first thing we look at is benefit for children and young people," she said. "Is the organisation clear about what improvements it wants to bring about, and is it clear about how it can do it?"

She said the organisation would also want to see "real enthusiasm, commitment and passion" from applicants.

The total amount of funding available for the small grants programme would depend on the quality of applications, said Malley, but funding for the small and large grants programmes together would exceed £38m in 2010.

Funding will be allocated at local level through seven regional UK bases in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Institute of Fundraising considers campaign against abolition of cheques

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 18 December 2009

The Institute of Fundraising has written to its members to ask whether it should lobby the Government against plans to phase out cheques by 2018.

The email asks members whether they think they will be able to convert all of their cheque donors to using other methods before cheques are phased out. The UK Payments Council has proposed that this should happen by 31 October 2018, if suitable alternatives can be developed.

The institute's message also encourages members to lobby MPs against the plan if they are concerned it will affect their income, and informs them about an early day motion tabled by Liberal Democrat MP Mark Hunter against the planned abolition.

A spokeswoman for the institute said: "If there is enough pressure from our members about the issue, we will take further action."

Cancer Research UK launches online donor choice system

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 4 December 2009

Cancer Research UK will allow donors to choose exactly where their money is spent with a new online system to be launched in March.

The scheme, called My Projects, is already on trial.

It allows supporters to specify that their money should be spent on researching specific types of cancer, or on funding cancer nurses.

The initiative also provides information about scientific research projects that are taking place and lets donors give directly to them.

Kevin Waudby, head of innovation at CRUK, said that in the past only major donors had been able to specify where their money was spent.

"Online fundraising means charities have to have closer relationships with all of their supporters and let them all have a say in what happens to their donations," he said.

Waudby said the aim of the new system was to bring in new donors rather than to encourage existing donors to give more.

A trial website for the scheme has been put in place, and the new site will be launched officially in March next year.

Public 'want to know how money is spent'

From Inside Track 151, 14.12.09

More than half of the general public would donate more money to charity if they knew exactly how it was spent. The research was carried out for donation website See the Difference, which will be launched next year. The data shows that 51% of people would give more if they knew how their money was spent and 40% would do so if they could actually see the difference their money was making.

Bmycharity donations in November almost double on previous year

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 9 December 2009

Nearly twice as much money was donated to charity through fundraising website Bmycharity in November as in the same month last year.

More than £546,000 was donated through the site in November 2009, compared with £247,000 in the same month in 2008.

The average amount donated through the site has increased from £54.24 to £59.26 for the same periods.

The site announced in October that it had removed its commission charges and would be funded instead by a £150 sign-up fee from charities and an 'applications' system whereby charities could choose which firms' adverts to place on their pages.

Ben Brabyn, managing director of Bmycharity, said more than 20 new charities had started using the site since it removed its commission charges. "In a tough economic environment, charities don't want to waste money by fundraising through sites that charge commission on charitable donations," he said.

"The increase in the average donation shows that when people know someone isn't taking a cut of their donations, they give more money."

Department of Health guidance stresses importance of grant funding

By John Plummer, Third Sector Online, 9 December 2009

The Department of Health has issued new guidance to primary care trusts stressing the importance of grant funding to charities.

The guidance, published on Wednesday, says it is a common misunderstanding that the move towards increased procurement and contracting means there is no longer a role for grants.

It says contracts "should not inappropriately replace grant funding" and grants are particularly appropriate for organisations that care for people with long-term conditions.

Kevin Curley, chief executive of local infrastructure group Navca, described the guidance as "a very welcome early Christmas present".

"I have argued strongly that grants are a key part of intelligent commissioning," he said. "A healthy local third sector needs a mix of funding that includes grants alongside contracts and donations. I am really encouraged that the Department of Health has listened to this argument and understood it.

"Local charities and community groups should make sure they get hold of a copy of this paper. It is a powerful tool we can use to challenge local commissioners who say they will not or cannot use grants."

27 ways to meet the fundraising challenge

Treasury urged to prioritise Gift Aid reform

By Paul Jump, Third Sector Online, 16 December 2009

The Treasury should urgently publish concrete proposals for Gift Aid reform in the light of research into the tax break, sector bodies have said.

Research published by the department this week showed that removing the tax rebate that higher-rate taxpayers can currently claim would not significantly affect their giving behaviour.

Ralph Michell, head of policy at chief executives body Acevo, said the research showed there was clear potential for the Treasury to reform Gift Aid to increase the sector's income in a way that higher rate taxpayers agreed with. But he said the key was what happened next.

"The Treasury has its evidence; now it needs to make some decisions," he said.

"Acevo is keen on evidence-based policy making, but we are not keen on procrastination-based evidence making."

Michell admitted there were still "issues to be worked through. But the Treasury needs to give us something it is seriously considering we can engage with. If it doesn't, we will have to seriously consider whether it is a good use of charitable funds to keep working on Gift Aid reform."

Jay Kennedy, policy officer at the Directory of Social Change, lamented the "series of non-statements in Budgets and pre-Budget reports" that had come after the original Gift Aid consultation in 2007.

"Considering the state of the public finances, it is easy to see why the Government is not interested in doing anything that might reduce tax revenue," he said. "But Gift Aid transitional relief is set to end in 2011, and everyone expects cuts in public spending that will affect many charities. Some real action on Gift Aid would demonstrate that the Government was serious about supporting charities through a difficult period."

Louise Richards, director of policy and campaigns at the Institute of Fundraising, welcomed the Treasury's promise of further consultation in 2010. But she said she was disappointed that nothing had come of the cross-sectoral campaign for an opt-out system and was not optimistic that any reform would happen before next year's general election.

But John Low, chief executive of the Charities Aid Foundation, said the Government was right to proceed carefully because many difficult issues needed to be ironed out.

"We want any changes to simplify the process for both charities and donors," he said. "They must also be long term and sustainable, anticipating any future changes that could affect the amount of Gift Aid that is claimable and the implications for donors such as income tax rates and rules."

Slimmed-down Compact is published

By Andy Ricketts, Third Sector Online, 16 December 2009

A radically slimmed-down version of the Compact has been published today. The new version of the agreement, which sets out how public and third sector organisations should treat each other, is 22 pages long, compared with more than 160 in the old version and its five codes of practice.

The old codes of practice have been removed and the document has been broken down into three areas covering policy development, resource allocation and equality.

The new agreement says:

- Any organisation subcontracting public service delivery contracts to third sector groups should abide by the Compact's principles.
- Public bodies should make payments to third sector organisations within 10 days of an invoice being received.
- Compact principles should apply to the distribution of EU funding.
- Third sector organisations should be actively involved in policy development rather than just consultation exercises.

The new section on "advancing equality", which has commitments to fair and equal access to funding, has been added because Voice4Change England raised concerns during the consultation process that losing the BME code would have a negative effect on third sector organisations working with minority groups.

The Commission for the Compact has also published a short guide, An Introduction to the Compact, aimed at people who are unfamiliar with the agreement.

Sir Bert Massie, Commissioner for the Compact, said the refresh process had been challenging.

"This Compact places a greater emphasis on government and public bodies explaining and justifying the decisions they make," he said. "It reaffirms the independence of third sector organisations and their right to campaign and comment on government policy."

Angela Smith, Minister for the Third Sector, said the refreshed Compact set out a clear agenda for future partnership.

"More than ever, a strong relationship based on trust between the third and public sectors is crucial for supporting communities and delivering strong public services," she said.

Jenny Willott, the Liberal Democrat spokeswoman on the third sector, said "concrete action" from the Government was needed to implement the Compact. Willott said Smith's recent breach of the Compact, when her department withdrew £750,000 of funding already promised to 32 third sector organisations under the Campaigning Research Programme, had shaken the sector's confidence in the Government's commitment to the Compact.

"The Office of the Third Sector must be a shining example to other public bodies over how to implement the Compact," she said. "This means making a gold-plated pledge never breach it ever again."

Volunteering England and TUC draw up 'volunteer charter'

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 7 December 2009

Volunteering England and the Trades Union Congress have signed a 'volunteer charter' that says volunteers should not be used to displace paid staff or undercut their pay and conditions.

The charter sets out a series of guidelines to be followed by charities and other employers that work with volunteers. The principles include making sure volunteers receive "reasonable out-of-pocket expenses" and have access, alongside paid workers, to training and development.

Volunteering England hopes the charter will be signed by charities, businesses and other volunteer-involving organisations, such as community groups. The charter also states that "the involvement of volunteers should complement and supplement the work of paid staff, and should not be used to displace paid staff".

The TUC has also produced guidance to accompany the charter. It says that "while volunteers are not entitled to the same rights as an employee, such as the minimum wage, holiday and sickness pay, they should still receive some form of agreement from the organisation they are volunteering with". It adds that such agreements should include information about the type of work the volunteer will be doing and the support they can expect from the organisation.

Brendan Barber, general secretary of the TUC, said: "An increasing number of interns and volunteers have been taken on during the recession. With so many people concerned about their jobs, it's vital that employers make a clear distinction between volunteers and paid staff."

The charter says there are 22 million volunteers in the UK and their contribution to the economy and society is worth £23bn a year.

Third sector minister will push for local authorities to fund volunteer centres

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 17 December 2009

Angela Smith, the Minister for the Third Sector, will ask Barbara Follett, the Minister for Communities and Local Government, to encourage local authorities to fund volunteer centres.

On Tuesday, at a meeting with Justin Davis Smith, chief executive of Volunteering England, Smith said she would raise the organisation's concerns about volunteer centre funding with the Communities and Local Government department.

She also said she would try to set up a meeting between the department and Volunteering England and would consider writing a foreword for a Volunteering England publication encouraging local authorities to fund volunteer centres.

At the Labour Party conference in Brighton in September, Smith said that volunteer centres should not expect new money from the Office of the Third Sector.

Speaking after the meeting, Davis Smith said: "Volunteering England has long been campaigning for central government to recognise the key role played by volunteer centres and to help secure their long-term financial sustainability.

"So we are pleased that the minister has restated her belief in the importance of volunteer centres and has agreed to work with us to help spread the message to local government."

Vetting and barring scheme will not put volunteers off, says report

By Kaye Wiggins, Third Sector Online, 14 December 2009

The new vetting and barring scheme will not put people off volunteering, the body running the system has concluded.

Sir Roger Singleton, chair of the Independent Safeguarding Authority, was asked in September by Ed Balls, the Secretary of State for Children, Schools and Families, to produce a report on the scheme after concerns were raised that the new system would deter people from volunteering.

Singleton's report, Drawing the Line, published yesterday, says he is "puzzled" by the claim that the bureaucracy involved in registering for checks will put people off volunteering.

"I can understand that the need to process a large number of registrations of new volunteers will create extra work for some organisations, but the process for individuals is straightforward," the report says.

Volunteers are far more likely to be deterred by other factors such as lack of time, lack of skills or experience and feeling that their efforts are not appreciated, it says.

The report also confirms that people whose work or volunteering with children is conducted through an organisation such as a charity or community group will have to register with the ISA to be checked.

But people who make informal arrangements with friends, families or other parents will not, contrary to what was understood when details of the scheme were revealed in September.

It says the "practical day-to-day arrangements which parents make with family, friends and other parents to care informally for each other's children" will not fall under the remit of the new scheme.

Charities: "Music Tax" but less Licensing?

The Government is abolishing an exemption for charities from music licensing rules which could result in significant bills for holding events with recorded music.

Abolition of the so-called PPL exemption will affect charity discos, tea dances, youth clubs, salsa groups, sports clubs, coffee mornings and even charity shops which have a radio in their staff room. The new levy will come into effect in April 2010 subject to the regulations being ratified by Parliament.

In a separate announcement the Government has indicated that live music performances for 100 people or less will no longer need to be licensed; this exemption should benefit smaller venues such as village halls.

- Best Heritage Project

Winners will receive a cash prize of £2,000 and will be determined by a public vote featured in a special BBC1 television show in the autumn. In addition, projects reaching the short-list stage will be showcased in local and national media, enabling them to share their success with people across the UK.

The awards are open to anyone, individually or as part of a group, who has successfully been awarded and used Lottery funding for any type and size of project, which has benefited UK residents.

Entries to the 2010 round of awards can be submitted from 11 January 2010.
